Understanding Stress and Its Effects¹

It's normal to feel stressed sometimes. It can even be a good thing in short bursts, helping you to avoid danger or to get things done. Any event or thought that sparks anger, frustration, or anxiety can cause a feeling of physical or emotional tension we call stress. Your body reacts to stress by releasing hormones, causing your brain to be more alert, your muscles to tense, and your heart rate to increase. This is very helpful in short periods of time, since it helps you handle the things which caused the stress. However, feeling stressed over prolonged periods can put you at risk of something much more serious, such as depression or anxiety, hypertension and heart disease.
